High-end Amplifiers
Group test inside
Accuphase • Chord • Audio Analogue
Audia • Graaf • Classe

GREAT ADVICE!
» Hi-fi Doctor
» Super Systems
» How to...
» Jargonbuster
» More Q&A
» Top tips

NOW WITH MORE
Top writers • Great photos
Superb tests • Buying tips
Top hi-fi advice • Test ratings

Pathos Endorphin
CD Style

THE HOT LIST!
OUR CHOICE OF the best hi-fi on the planet!

Speakers
Exclusive verdicts on...
» Usher S520 bookshelves
» REL's new 505 sub
» MonoPulse 22 floorstanders

Players
Tested inside
» Pathos Endorphin CD player
» Harman Kardon DVD47 universal
» Musical Fidelity kW250S: one-box

Amps
Exclusives!
» Conrad-Johnson LP70S tube power
» Arcam C31 pre-amp

UK £3.95 US $9.50 Aus $9.95
Flying high

You'd be hard pushed to find a Pathos product that didn’t appeal to the eye, but with the Endorphin CD player the Italian-based company has created one of the most covetable pieces of kit since the first Oracle turntable. And it sounds, well, astonishing...
"Those of us who were awake the day that they were teaching peptides in biology know that endorphin is a chemical occurring in the brain."

suckinctly as follows: 'For years, a common belief within the audiophile community has been that of tubes "warming up" the cold and sharp digital sound. Today, with the ultimate digital technology – and you can stay sure we are using the very ultimate – this is no longer the case.'
'So what are those tubes for? The fact is tubes are, still today, the very best device available for amplifying voltage. And that’s the one and only reason why we use tubes in our analogue stage of the Endorphin. No fashion, no nostalgia.”

Now that is a seriously cool message, and it’s hard to believe it was probably written by the guy who came up with the name. But there are two Sovtek 6H30Ps peeping out between the rear aluminium struts, a juxtaposition that would cause you to do a double-take had you not been pre-warned that this is a hybrid. A vast expanse of gleaming black Perspex accented by aluminium pillars, CD aperture surround and disc cover, a flip-up display – and then this abject, unashamed modernism is punctuated by a brace of valves pointing upward like, well, a pair of pert nipples. But deliberate sexuality or not, the effect is like fitting a wind-up clock to the dash of a Ferrari 599.

HOT OFF THE LINE

Because the Endorphin is hot off the assembly line – the owner’s manual even has ‘provisional’ written across its cover in red ink – information is in short supply. This is par for the Pathos course, as it does like to play its cards close to its collective chest, but I can at least tell you that the player offers both single-ended (RCA) and balanced (XLR) outputs and both coaxial and optical digital outputs should you wish to use it solely as a transport.

Which would seem rather wasteful, as the unit contains dual-differential 24-bit delta-sigma DACs with conversion up to 192kHz and the Class A, zero-feedback analogue stage is, as you now know from the above clues, fully-balanced and valve-equipped.

Fine on-board processing or not, I still tried it through a few DACs of varying vintages, pedigrees and levels of sophistication, and found – as is so often the case with well-conceived, single-chassis players not burdened by the compromises of economy – that the Pathos transport works perfectly with its own DAC. I think the word one would borrow from an oenophile is l’abbinamento. However, it did reveal its own unique signature through whatever DAC I fed it – from the affordable Quad CDP99II to the Marantz DA-12 – so I could see Pathos one day offering it solely as a transport should the savings sans DAC be large enough to justify its removal.

Aside from the irritating lack of button identification, operation was utterly straightforward. The beautifully-designed-and-made lid was easily re-positioned over the CD, the magnets snapping it into place, and not once did I lift it off to find myself scythed by a flying CD – or disco volante, given the provenance of the Endorphin.

Neither did I encounter any mismatches with the various systems I employed. The bulk of the listening, however, consisted of the Pathos fed through the McIntosh C2200 pre-amp and MC2102 power-amp via Yter interconnects for single-ended use and Kimbers for balanced. The McIntosh in turn drove the Sonus faber Guarnieri (original rather than current) through Yter speaker cable.

Maybe it's because I let the unit warm up sufficiently before giving it a whirl, but my initial exposure was positively revelatory. I slipped in 'Mo's sublime Peace... Back by Popular Demand. Bam! He was in the room, sound free of artefacts, living and breathing and... natural. I was so shocked by the sound that I can only describe myself as 'taken aback.' Obviously, by that I mean 'good' taken aback. It wasn't the usual audio schizophrenia of yet another expensive, poorly-made piece of crap that delivered killer sound. You can see that I was falling prey to that vile audiophilic prejudice which dictates that If A Product Looks Good, It Must Sound Dire Because The Money Was Spent On Cosmetics Rather Than Internals. I was ashamed of myself for pre-judging the Pathos in a style-vs-substance face-off. Just like its automotive brethren from Modena and environs, the Pathos is quick to prove that it's not merely pretty. Its performance is on a par with its styling.

IT'S AN ITALIAN THING
Further listening confirmed the first impression. Although I tend to concentrate on the midband, the Pathos showed both its mettle and its personality at the frequency extremes. It was a toothsome mix of old and new, whatever their mission statement about tubes might argue, a layer of tight, rock-solid bass at one end, and silky-smooth highs at the other. This sandwiched a warm, life-like mid-section that floated above and against one of the most silent and 'black' backgrounds I've heard from any device carrying tubes. It reminded me immediately of the Musical Fidelity kW DM25, but with even fewer vestiges of forwardness or aggression. (And the MF is so welcoming that I actually bought the review sample.)

Just as the Pathos' physical shape is all about presence and presentation, so is it with music. The Endorphin sounds large and wide open, exploiting the fabulous 3D portrayal of the Guarneris by © filling the room with one of the most coherent soundscapes one could hope to hear. More impressive than the stage width was the front-to-back depth, which will have some of you feeding it a diet of huge orchestral works or majestic soundtracks such as Glory.

ACE WITH BASS

Equally, some of you will treasure this for the bass alone. It respected completely the gentle yet prominent bass that underscores the Keb’ Mo’ masterwork; equally it boogied along with Blind Melon and their greatest hits, and Leslie West via a trio of recent blues-based releases.

As the latter performer’s work is electric-guitar-driven, there was also an opportunity to assess the Pathos attack: the transients were nearly Krell-like. This spoke more of the unit’s solid-state DNA than its tube element.

But, as ever, I was seduced by the middle, and what this player does for vocals is simply, well, beguiling. Keb’ Mo’s voice is rich and textured; Art Garfunkel’s is as ethereal as a whiff of Balenciaga on a passer-by. The Pathos caressed both voices, retrieved their form, presented them squarely in the room with authentic sibilance, with hints of breathing.

Temperature rising, I turned to my preferred gender — Brenda Lee belting out ‘Break It To Me Gently’, followed by Juice Newton’s take on the same song. The Pathos followed the entire range of their full-pelt torch singing, conveying the sheer vocal power; conversely, its true background silences ensured that the more intimate moments in the same song were treated like fragile buds.

This was all getting way to hot and smouldering for me, given that I would rather not suggest any sexual affiliation with audio. Suffice it to say that the experience was as an Italian would have it: ripe, sensual, emotional. A ripe Barolo and a plate of prosciutto and figs. And we’re talking about CD, for goodness sake.

I doubt that anybody would attribute the above to the hissy-fit we call the iPod. On the other hand, I am not suggesting that the Pathos Endorphin is a substitute for the LP. And at £4500, it’s expensive enough to strike some of you as wholly offensive. (In which case, you should go back to reading The Big Issue and leave the rest of us sybarites alone.) While I refuse to create a pecking order, I will state emphatically that this joins my current two faves — the Musical Fidelity kW25 and the Audio Research CD7 — for its utterly masterful CD playback.

But it pretty much slughters everything for style.